THEIR LITTLE GAME.

the latter is posing before the coun- crops. try as an offended and outraged statesman, and pointing out the disastrous effects of Grants' overthrow, the former is taking the lead in Mexican affairs and seeking to cement the social and political relations of the wo republics. Have these two positions any connection or political significance? To the casual observer they appear widely divergent, but a closer inspection seems to indicate that they are dovetailed into one another, and for the probable purpose intimated in the opening sentence of this article.

In the first place it is not consistent with Grants' nature to suppose term with his Chicago defeat. He is not of a disposition given to dispair, it was his persistency that won his victories and brought him success in war. Like all military heroes Grant dreams of empire and thinks the acquisition of territory brings honor to the nation. He will work up the development of the coal regions. Mexico, pave the way for its annexthe country has already been set temple that he has the power to de- jor portion of the fund. stroy. Death to the Republican again into public life. This is the handsomely. little game that Grant and Conkling are probably playing. It is a desperate game, but Conkling is vain to undertake anything.

Georgia has taken the lead in truck farming, as she has in most all Southern enterprises, and vast fields in that state are now devoted to the cultivation of fruits and vegetables. The railroads are running refrigerator cars into all the fruit and vegetable growing sections and making the transportation of such products cheap and rapid. Tennessee probably comes next to Georgia in the extent to which she engages in this new found industry. In Davidson and Sumner counties many acres are now devoted to fruits and Irish potatoes are becoming a staple crop in those sections.
